Ella. Later that afternoon, I stand in my studio. The air smells like fresh paint and promise. One of Micha's songs plays from my iPod dock, and my heart dances to the rhythm as I sing the lyrics under my breath. The ghost of your soul still thrives. Deep in your eyes yet buried alive. Ashes surround you, drown you in pain.

I remember when Micha and I bought the two-story home after his songs really started selling. It was the view that won me over. For Micha, it was the large, “sex-worthy” bathtub in the master bathroom. “Jeez, Ella, you never sugarcoat anything,” Lila says with a heavy sigh. “Sorry. My head just went to a really weird place.”
